THE DYSART MAUSOLEUM

The MMT Gazetteer records that "the Tollemaches of Buckminster Park are an ancient family claiming Saxon descent. It was Lord Huntingtower (1766-1833) who decreed in his will the construction of a family mausoleum at Buckminster, but nothing was built until after the death of Lionel William John Tollemache, the 8th Lord Dysart (1794-1872)." The delay may have been occasioned in part by the the adventures of the reprobate William Lionel Felix Tollemache, Lord Huntingtower (1820-1872), son of the eighth and father of the ninth Earl, who embroiled the family in a series of scandals culminating in a claim on the title, initiated by his common-law wife, that was only resolved in 1881.

The earldom is a peerage of Scotland, created in 1643 for William Murray (d.1655). The first marriage of his daughter, the colourful Elizabeth, 2nd Countess of Dysart (1626-1698), to Sir Lionel Tollemache (1624-1669), 3rd Baronet of Helmingham, united their respective estates and titles until the death of the ninth Earl in 1935. (Elizabeth lived principally at Ham House, and became the Duchess of Lauderdale by her scandalous second marriage, but that is another story.) Over the generations, the family have variously represented Fowey and East Looe, Orford and Suffolk, Northampton and Liskeard in the House of Commons.

The Dysart mausoleum is situated on the east side of the parish church of St. John the Baptist, Buckminster, Leicestershire, half a mile from the border with Lincolnshire. The land slopes gently from east to west (photo, p.3), and the church is approached by a long drive that skirts the walled garden of the adjacent house to an entrance opposite the old stable block and farm buildings.

The Arts & Crafts architect Halsey Ricardo (1854-1928) is known to have spent some considerable effort at Buckminster on behalf of William John Manners Tollemache, 9th Earl of Dysart (1859-1935). The commission came early in Ricardo's career and was a welcome change from the design of interiors and fireplaces that initially formed the main work of his practice.

Halsey Ricardo trained under the architect Norman Shaw, and would go on to spend ten years in partnership with the ceramic artist William De Morgan – and to design the spectacular Debenham House in London's Holland Park (now Grade I Listed) for the co-founder of the Debenham & Freebody department store in 1906. The Dysart mausoleum is his only known surviving work in the Gothic style; it is of a piece and a good example of the ecclesiastical architecture of the 1880s.

At Buckminster, Ricardo made alterations to the major state rooms of the Georgian house, carried out improvements to the estate buildings, and formed the building of the mausoleum for the Tollemache family. The total estimated cost of the work at Buckminster was £13,000 – a tidy sum for 1882.

Lord Dysart was much involved with his life outside the estate and was unaware of the considerable cost of the instructions that he placed with Ricardo in his attempt to rationalize and improve the buildings on the Buckminster estate. The client and his architect parted company before all of the work was envisaged.

Unfortunately, the house was demolished in 1952 and a neo-Georgian building erected on its site in the mid-1960s. Ricardo's interiors were stripped and sold: an impressive Wedgwood mantelpiece from the dining room was acquired by the Birmingham Museum of Art in Alabama only last year, but the present location of much of the rest, if it still survives, is as yet unknown.

The Dysart mausoleum is of a simple plan, with its main chamber a rectangular space formed north/south with two lesser spaces east and west, one of which accommodates the entrance. The only light into the vault comes from a window in the gable of the bay opposite the door.

The mausoleum, with the church beyond

The walls are of deep pinkish red sandstone patterned with yellow, and the roofs are formed with massive slate tiles that over-sail the walls at the eaves, where they are thrust out with stone corbelling. The ridges of the roofs to the porch and the east gable are considerably lower than that to the main chamber and their eaves are higher, thus adding emphasis to the hierarchy of the parts of the building.

At each corner of the plan are two large buttresses. Those to the east and west walls are oversize; their roof ridges cut into the eaves' cornice on the east and run completely past the eaves' line on the west. The buttresses to the south and north gable are off-set from the wall in four stages; those to the east gable are similar, but the west gable wall has a pair at each corner that are of a similar pattern to those at the ends of the building.

The south gable has a triple window opening at its apex, while the east gable has a small arched window and the west gable has a blank rose window; however, there is no obvious access to the attic space. The stonework to the north and south walls seems to be banded but the effect has been somewhat lost in the weathering. That to the east and west walls is of square blocks of stonework.

The mausoleum is contained within square sectioned iron railings and a gate with neat cast iron standards at regular intervals that hold the top and intermediate rails. The top section railings are at twice the centres of those on the bottom section, the rails raised in a curve where necessary as the ground rises.

The entrance door is framed with a gothic stone arch capped with a finial in pink and yellow sandstone banding. The door is of English oak with elaborate iron hinges and a centre band to take the handle and lock plate. The doorway is brought forward from the gable wall in order to allow the finial to be free-standing and so the wall is stepped back above the arch with a short section of slate sheeting.

The entrance comprises a large flight of eleven stone steps that give access to the catacomb. At the base of these steps, the size of the mausoleum is truly revealed as half the building's volume is actually below ground level.

The entrance and wide steps into the vault

Within the building, the High Victorian Gothic game is played to the full. Three large vaults on the central axis are held up by eight stone pillars, their bases at approximately ground level. Standing on the top of the vaults at either end are the stone tracery of blank windows that run from skirting level to the apex of the vault groins for the full width of the bay. There are 27 loculi the east side, and two blocks of nine loculi on the west, on either side of the steps. The loculi are formed of a slate shelf with stone uprights.

A plaque beneath the glazing in the centre of the window tracery on the east wall explains that the vault was constructed pursuant to the will of William,

Empty loculi and the plaque commemorating Lord Huntingtower's original instructions

Lord Huntingtower. Yet only five of the loculi are filled, along the bottom row on the north-east side – shortly after the mausoleum was completed, the family chose to be buried in the church.

The first compartment contains the patient remains of Lord Huntingtower, finally laid to rest in his family mausoleum half a century after his will called for it to be built. His only companions are three Tollemaches and his son, the eighth Lord Dysart, after whose death the project was at last initiated.

The mausoleum is in good condition generally. The stonework underground is stained pink, saturated with damp but there is no obvious sign of spawling of the stonework or detailed carving.

ST. GEORGE'S GARDENS

On Saturday, June 27, MMT Chairman Roger Bowdler will lead a walk through St. George's & St. Pancras' Gardens, London WC1 (p.7). St. George's mark one of the first London burial grounds created away from a church; fragments of gravestones still separate the grounds of St. George the Martyr, Queen Square, and St. George's Bloomsbury. The site was designed by the architect of the latter, Nicholas Hawksmoor, who may have contributed to the fine monument marking the first burial, of Robert Nelson in 1715. Amongst the many unmarked graves, a chest tomb stands over Oliver Cromwell's grand-daughter Anna Gibson (d.1726), and flowers are still left for a group of Jacobites hanged, drawn and quartered in Kennington in 1745. The site also occasioned the country's first indictment for bodysnatching, in 1777, for which two men were sentenced to six months' imprisonment and a whipping.

Desperately overcrowded, it was finally closed to burials in 1855, and reopened as a public park in 1884. It survived Blitz damage but was in a sorry state when the Friends of St. George's Gardens formed in 1994 to work with Camden Council to preserve the space as a public amenity. The present gardens opened in 2001, thanks to lottery funding secured in 1997 under the Urban Parks Programme.

The Gardens include a mortuary chapel of 1806, now used as the Friends' meeting place, an obelisk of 1729, and a figure of the muse Euterpe that originally decorated the Apollo Inn (1898) on Tottenham Court Road (demolished 1961). Its plantings include "one of the finest groups of ferns to be found in central London".

BEQUESTS

Over the past years, the Mausolea & Monuments trust has received substantial donations in lieu of flowers in memory of late members who valued and supported the Trust, as well as a generous bequest from a will.

We hope that those who can will remember us amongst other charities in their wills, and be remembered in turn for helping to preserve some of the country's most remarkable and splendid buildings.

A bequest to the Mausolea & Monuments Trust represents an extremely valuable gift to us, free of Inheritance Tax. The gift need not be large, but will always be carefully used and much appreciated.

The form that such a gift might take is set out below; please ask your solicitor to insert such a bequest in your testamentary provisions. You may specify a certain sum of money, or designate a proportion of your estate as a bequest.

SAMPLE FORM OF BEQUEST

*I bequeath a legacy of the sum of £ .....
(for a pecuniary bequest), or ...% of the residue of my estate (for a residuary bequest) to the Mausolea & Monuments
Trust (Registered Charity N<sup>o</sup> 1106634)
whose office is at 70 Cowcross Street,
London EC1M 6EJ, for its general purposes.
I declare that the receipt of the Secretary for the time being of the said Trust shall be a good and sufficient discharge to my Executor in respect of such legacy.*

STUDY DAY: NORTH-WEST NORFOLK
10:00, Downham Market, Norfolk

Private mortuary aisles were popular with the nobility and landed gentry during the 17th century. This visit, organized by Dr. Julian Litten, will look at some examples in north-west Norfolk, including the Coke monuments at Tittleshall, with works by Nicholas Stone, Abraham Storey, Charles Atkinson, L.F. Roubiliac and Nollekens; the Barkham Mortuary Chapel at South Acre (John and Matthias Christmas); the Spelman monuments of 1496 to 1679 at Narborough; and the Hare Mortuary Aisle at Stow Bardolph, with works by Grinling Gibbons, Peter Scheemakers, McDaniel and William Theed plus, of course, the famed wax effigy to Sarah Hare (d.1744).

A coach will meet the 08.45 train from Kings Cross at Downham Market, then travel to Tittleshall, South Acre, Castle Acre, Narborough and Stow Bardolph, returning to Downham Market to catch the 18.09, arriving at King's Cross at 19.33. A long day, but a rewarding one! Tickets: £25 for members, £30 for non-members (not including lunch or travel to Downham Market). Please book with Dr. Litten (Friarscot, Church Street, King's Lynn, Norfolk PE30 5EB) by Friday, September 18, making cheques payable to The Mausolea & Monuments Trust.

A PRIVATE HOME IN CLAPHAM

Near Clapham South tube station

The success of our magical evening at Malplaquet House, Stepney, last autumn has inspired another member to offer his house for an exclusive fund-raising visit, this time to Clapham and the early 20th century. Although tens of thousands of middle-class terraced houses were built at the end of the 19th century, very few have retained their character and fittings through changes in fashion and the ravages of time. This will be a rare opportunity to enjoy the colourful and atmospheric interiors of just such a home, probably lived in by the family of a clerk who commuted to the City on the Northern Line extension, which reached Clapham Common in 1900. The house contains an interesting collection of antique, Arts and Crafts and contemporary furnishings which the owners have built up over more than twenty years. There will be an introductory talk about the development of Clapham, and the house and its contents in particular. The house is 10 minutes' walk from Clapham South tube station; full details will be sent with tickets. Numbers are strictly limited, so early application is advised: £15 for members, £18 for non-members, including wine.

THE DARNLEY MAUSOLEUM

One of the largest restoration projects of recent times is finally coming to fruition. Once the saddest mausoleum of all – the pyramid-topped pile in Cobham's battered Park, built to house the bodies of the Bligh family, Earls of Darnley – has now been rescued and faces a bright future.

Designed by James Wyatt and built in 1783-86, the Darnley mausoleum is one of the great works of English neo-classicism. It comprises a square central section, with a circular, domed chapel within; beneath is a low burial chamber containing loculi for coffins. Angle-set pairs of columns at the corners support a delicate cornice, with sarcophagi (proclaiming the funereal purpose of the building) standing at the base of the pyramid above. This soars aloft, its Portland stone profile standing proud upon this North Downs ridge, high above the Thames and Medway estuaries, some six miles south-east of Gravesend near the old road from London to Dover.

Owing to a dispute with the Bishop of Rochester, the building was never consecrated, so no Darnley or Bligh ever lay here – they are in fact buried in and around the great parish church of St. Mary Magdalene, home of England's finest set of monumental brasses.

A wheeze from Humphry Repton, to adapt it for use as a belvedere, never came to much, so the costly structure simply stood in Cobham Park, a reminder of thwarted sepulchral ambition and the power of episcopal control. An Irish title, much of the Darnley's income had come from a 25,000 acre estate in County Meath; declining fortunes led to the sale of the house in 1957, and the park was effectively abandoned. Vandals made the building a target of malign attention, and on Bonfire Night 1980, a pyre of tyres and petrol cans was lit within the crypt, blowing in the floor and darkening the interior. The Reptonian setting was peppered with burnt-out cars and scoured by scramble bikes. The site was one of southern England's worst cases of a building at palpable risk. Nor was it any owner's responsibility, after a failed conversion scheme landed the mausoleum in the hands of HM Receiver.

The interior of the Darnley mausoleum before restoration

Salvation came from the Channel Tunnel Rail Link. The old Dover Road is now subsumed by dual carriageway and cutting: this is a part of Kent that has paid a heavy price for modernity. Compensation was paid for the Chunnel's clipping the northern edge of Cobham's pleasure ground, and a consortium – The National Trust, English Heritage, The Woodland Trust, Natural England, Union Railways, Kent County Council, Gravesham Borough Council and Cobham Hall – created the Cobham Ashenbank Management Scheme (CAMS) to find a solution for this neglected but splendid corner of the North Downs.

CAMS, based at Council offices in Gravesend, has been very successful indeed in securing funds, and caring for the landscape. Over £8m has been spent all told. Support from the Heritage Lottery Fund (HLF) was secured to rescue this area, and make Cobham Park's salvation part of the revitalization of this northern tip of a national Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty (AONB). The National Trust has agreed to care for the mausoleum, and handover from Gravesham (to whom all credit is due) is imminent. This is a happy story.

The upper registers after restoration

In September 2008, the restored mausoleum was re-opened by Adam Ivo Stuart Bligh, 11th Earl of Darnley. Over £.3m has been spent in reversing the ravages of vandalism, and returning the mausoleum to its original state, with the Canterbury office of Purcell Miller Tritton as the architects. Modern conservation generally draws the line at preventing further deterioration, and is suspicious of reinstatement. Here, the decision was taken to turn the clock back and reinstate the floor and lost fixtures such as the flying stair and the paved moat. The interior has been returned to its state as intended: new stained glass lights the space, and the chaste Ionic altar was restored from scratch (the latter as the gift of the Georgian Group, which led the charge for rescue as long ago as the 1940s).

This mausoleum needs to be seen, and Cobham makes for a super day out (take the train to Sole Street, and head north-eastwards through the orchards). The rescued building is a powerful witness to the quality of the 3rd Earl of Darnley's antique vision of a fitting place to die for. It is one of Wyatt's finest designs, and eminently deserving of respect and care, as is the recovering ancient woodland. I am glad to have known it in its darker days, when lewd and druggy graffiti scarred the walls: no place that I knew spoke so eloquently of the departure of aristocratic ownership, and the vengeful destructiveness that filled the vacuum. We aren't used to full restoration any more, and I am still getting used to the pristine look of the place. But go and see for yourself – slowly but surely, the shades of neoclassical mourning are returning to these funereal glades.

ROGER BOWDLER

The MMT aims to organize a visit to the mausoleum later this year, and a public open day will be held on the afternoon of Saturday, September 27 (see www.cobham-park.org.uk for details). The building and its rescue are the subjects of articles by John Martin Robinson in Country Life (18 March 2009) and Roger Bowdler in Apollo (May 2009).

A MODERN FAMILY MAUSOLEUM

A farmer in south-east Cornwall has been granted permission to build a mausoleum within the footprint of a ruined chapel in a corner of one of his own fields. Despite some opposition from the local Head of Development Control, The Cornwall Times reports that both Caradon County Council and the immediate community expressed 'overwhelming support' for the plan. One local resident greeted the decision as "great news – I think it is good that the Council have seen common sense."

The proposed natural stone building will sit comfortably within low standing remains at the eastern end of the old chapel. It will contain shelves for six zinc-lined coffins, with a stout door on one end and a small window on the other. Not least to answer concerns about security and propriety, the entrance will be fitted with a five-lever lock and 'only a recognized undertaker will be allowed access'.

A small memorial garden will be laid to gravel on the south side of the building, with casual seating formed from salvaged granites, and suggested plantings of low-growing shrubs and flowers such as azalea, dwarf berberis, wild daffodil and primula. The site will be protected variously by a timber gate, post and rail fences, and hedges of beech, hawthorn and holly.

The mausoleum was designed by Bernard Wooster of Liskeard for a family with deep ties to the area. The client – who does not seek further publicity – wishes to be laid to rest where he has always lived, with space for his descendants to follow. "You have to think about it while you are alive," he says, "because it is a personal matter."

GET INVOLVED WITH THE MMT

The Mausolea & Monuments Trust has achieved a great deal in its first decade, punching well above its weight as a small charity driven entirely by the work of volunteers.

Members can help in the work of the Trust in many ways:

- Most specifically, we would like an architect or building surveyor to become a Trustee. This typically involves four evening meetings a year in central London, and some involvement in current studies and projects. Please contact the Secretary at the address below if you might consider becoming a Trustee.
- More widely, we welcome reports on local mausolea from members around the country, both to keep a watching brief on those already entered in our online gazetteer, and to expand that database with photos and descriptions of mausolea not yet recorded. Please e-mail gazetteer@mausolea-monuments.org.uk or write to the office at the address below.
- Members and others are warmly encouraged to contribute articles on mausolea, their conservation, and the families that built them, to this newsletter. Please contact the editor at the address in the sidebar.
- The Trustees greatly appreciate suggestions for outings and lectures, and would welcome assistance in planning visits to mausolea, special events and exhibitions from members in the local area. Please address your suggestions to the Secretary at the address below.
- Ultimately, every member would do the Trust a great service by recruiting just one new member – please help to increase awareness of the MMT and its work amongst other societies and special interest groups.
